BSPA

The Black Student's Psychological Association (BSPA) is an international organization of students seeking to enhance the training of African American psychologists. This includes developing skills to adapt psychological principles for use in the Black community, and creating culturally valid research methods. Universities from the United States and other countries maintain BSPA chapters.

Dr. Bobbie Anthony, the organization's founder, was a faculty member at CSU. The university has maintained a chapter since the association's inception, which has helped the school become a leader in preparing students from diverse backgrounds in Psychology. BSPA, one of the most respected organizations on campus, is open to all students regardless of major, age, ethnicity, gender, religion, sexual orientation, or physical ability. Anyone can join who has an interest in psychological issues related to African Americans.

The BSPA continues to actively recruit and retain students of color in psychology by sponsoring academic and community programs. Members work closely with the Association of Black Psychologists, an organization of professionals, to create a network for mentoring and individual growth. A large portion of BSPA's strength lies in its history and its rich legacy of accomplishments. This legacy continues at CSU.
